The American Basketball Association championship ring, the Stanley Cup, the Masters, the World Series, the World Championships and now the NBA All-Star Game. These trophies come with a code. Not only a mystique but an undercurrent of redemption. The baseball fan, the golfer, the tennis fanatic has been fed the right myths and seen his or her favorite sports superstar summon the necessary talent and selflessness to hoist that trophy. ESPN.com. The basketball fan knows that the most prized trophy won at the All-Star Game isn't the most valuable piece of hardware -- it's the MVP trophy. The one that's won by the best player in the league over the previous season. The MVP trophy is given by the fans, not the commissioner or the players. It goes to the player they think had the most impact on the season, the one whose efforts put them over the edge to win the most games and help their team to the best record. I asked myself this question after the NBA Finals. I saw LeBron James put up numbers that rivaled those of the great Michael Jordan, and watched Kevin Durant dominate, and watched the Miami Heat win two NBA titles. I wanted to know if that was enough for me to give James the MVP award. Was James overrated because he had the stats to back up his team-first performance? Was Durant's performance so incredible that he should be MVP without question? James and Durant were both spectacular. And what impressed me even more about LeBron was that he did it while playing with a broken finger on his left hand. Do you think Jordan would have been better had he played with a broken right hand? What about Steve Nash? You think they would have been able to carry the Heat's heavy minutes without having LeBron's spur-of-the-moment clutch plays, the hyper-aggressive transition, the rebounds and free throws? LeBron's the MVP, and so he should be. He made his teammates better. He was the one who got that team to the Finals and the one who made it win the title. He's a great player. He does great things. He's a joy to watch. He can jump over 7-footers and dunk on small forwards. He can work the angles and get the shot.

I have uploaded the songs in this album to google drive through their uploaders comments and making it open access. My upload is as a preview if you download you have to sign in to your google account. A: Two more encoders are available (there's an order on the list of video encoders) So this was a very disappointing thread to find, but here goes. So the new album from Knocked Out Jesus is a lot of fun to listen to. It's certainly a departure from what the band has done in the past, and that's not necessarily a bad thing. I wasn't that crazy about it when I first heard it, but I've come to appreciate it more and more as I've listened to it over the last few weeks. The new song from Tomb of Annihilation, "Bring Back Dead", has only recently hit the streets, and it sounds like a lot of fun. Granted, the band hasn't yet played it live (as far as I know), but it's a great song all the same. Here's the YouTube video for it if you're interested. The following song, "The Black Chapter", was recorded in 2017, but the band has just revealed it a few days ago. So there's no set release date yet, but I'd say it'll be a summer 2018 release. The band's about to tour Canada in support of the album, so I'd say it'll be late 2018 before we see it released. In the meantime, I'd recommend checking out some of their live performances on YouTube or on their bandcamp page. That's all for now. All three of these albums are worth checking out. I think I'll leave you with an image of the band in 1972, doing what they do best. Enjoy!
