Optical discs have a greater capacity than magnetic discs and, therefore, have been adapted as information recording media for computers and information communication appliances. For example, optical discs are used as storage media for digital audio systems, personal computers and video cameras. Such optical discs are provided with a recording area into which information is to be recorded by an optical pickup. The optical pickup reads the recorded information from the recording area or writes new information into the recording area. The optical pickup includes an objective lens for forming an optical spot of a predetermined diameter on the recording area of the optical disc. In order to attain high density recording, a high numerical aperture (NA) is required for the objective lens. However, if the numerical aperture of the objective lens is increased, the aberration caused by a tilt between the optical disc and the optical pickup increases and the distance between the optical disc and the optical pickup becomes too short, resulting in a decrease in the tolerance of focusing and tracking. In particular, the tolerance of the focal position is decreased due to an oblique incident of the light beam onto the optical disc. A conventional tilt detector for detecting a tilt between the optical disc and the optical pickup is described below. A region having a slightly different reflectance from the rest of the recording area is formed on the surface of the optical disc to serve as a reference region. The tilt is detected on the basis of the difference in the amount of light between the reference region and the rest of the recording area. A tracking error signal is calculated by applying a push-pull signal to the output signal from the photodetector to which the light beam emitted from the optical pickup is reflected. A tracking offset signal which is the amount of deviation of the tracking error signal from the center of the tracking range is calculated. The tracking error signal is also applied to a focusing error signal generator for generating a focusing error
